The first part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the various methods which have been employed for the determination of the rate of reaction between a solid and a liquid. The most common method is that of measuring the change in weight of the solid as the reaction proceeds. This method is simple and direct, but it is often difficult to obtain accurate results, especially when the reaction is slow. Other methods which have been employed are the measurement of the volume of gas evolved, the measurement of the change in viscosity of the liquid, and the measurement of the change in the refractive index of the liquid. Each of these methods has its own advantages and disadvantages, and the choice of method depends upon the nature of the reaction and the materials involved.

The rate of reaction is a function of time.
